

I really oppose any rule or legislation that would invalidate Indiana's no call law. There are so many ways for a company to market it's products and services--mail, billboard, newspaper, television--that my privacy rights not to be disturbed at home by phone calls is very important. The problem with phone calls is that you cannot ignore them. I can be rude to them and I am. I hang up on them. But even at that, it is still an intrusion. Since I signed up on the no call list, I really appreciate the difference. Why should my privacy be violated by some minimum wage telephone soliciter with some automated dialing equipment. The fact that the FCC is even considering a rule banning no call lists indicates that the special interest groups have unfair access. It is a matter of choice and my choice is that they are not to call. Thanks.
